

Market Comment

Risk-off mood abated on tariff delay.

- Trade tensions between China and the U.S. softened after the Trump administration stated that it will delay the 10% tariff on some Chinese imports until December 15, including cell phones, laptop computers and certain items of footwear and clothing. However, some tariffs will take effect in September as planned.
- Germany's ZEW indicator of Economic Sentiment fell more than expected to its lowest level since December 2011 in August (-44.1 points, consensus -28 points, previous month -24.5 points), suggesting a significant worsening of Germany's economic outlook. The escalation in the trade conflict, the risk of competitive devaluations and the chance of a disorderly Brexit weighted on its economic growth and will increase the pressure on German exports and industrial production. Moreover, the assessment of the economic situation in Germany also deteriorated considerably in August (-13.5 points, consensus -6.3 points, previous month -1.1 points).
- Elsewhere, U.S. core CPI, excluding food and energy, increased slightly more than expected in July, the same increase as in June (0.3% m/m, consensus 0.2% m/m, previous month 0.3% m/m). July's gain was broad-based despite the fall in the new vehicles index. Notwithstanding, investors are still expecting three more Fed rate cuts by the end of the year.
- The U.S. Treasury yields rose with the spread between 2-10Y yields, reaching its narrowest since 2007, led by the tariff delay. Meanwhile, the yield on the 10Y German bond hit a new record low (-0.61%) driven by a gloomy German economic outlook. Peripheral risk premia were mixed with Italy's risk premium narrowing sharply after the Senate delayed the date for the no-confidence vote. Moreover, Italy's Deputy PM Di Maio noted that his Five Star Movement would support the government led by PM Conte in a confidence vote.
- The DXY index strengthened while safe-haven currencies trimmed early gains with the JPY ending underperforming across the G10 board. Meanwhile, the FXJPEMCS index inched up but the ARS extended yesterday's significant losses. In Asia, the PBoC lowered its daily fixing for nine consecutive days, although stronger than expected, with the Chinese Yuan gaining, especially the offshore Yuan.
- Gold prices pared its surge, ending with a slight decline, driven by the trade relief. Oil prices rose significantly ahead of tomorrow's U.S. crude oil inventories data.
- Emerging-market credit default swaps rose significantly yesterday driven by concerns of Argentina's spillover to other developing countries. The cost of insuring against the default on Argentine debt with 5Y CDS soared 120% after Macri lost in a presidential primary, stoking fears of a more protectionist government comeback.
- Stocks picked up as trade angst eased. Information technology leads the gains in the S&P while its implied volatility declined to levels below 20.
