Brazil: inflation broadly in line with expectations, but focus is now on the external front

Inflation remains high and convergence to the target should only occur in 2013. However, the deterioration of the external scenario should have a deflationary effect and create more room for the CB leaving the SELIC rate unchanged in the end of August

- Inflation reached 0.16%m/m in July, broadly in line with BBVA and markets expectations (BBVA: 0.20%m/m; markets: 0.18%m/m). In yearly terms, inflation reached 6.87%y/y, the highest level in six years.
- As in June, when inflation was 0.15%m/m (6.71%y/y), domestic prices continued to benefit in July from lower commodity prices (food and beverages inflation was equal to -0.34%m/m) and some seasonal factors. Nonetheless, the strength of domestic demand continued pressuring prices.
- The figures released today do not change our view on inflation. We expect monthly inflation to be around 0.3%m/m in August and then to average 0.45%m/m between September and December. In yearly terms, a high base effect should allow inflation to trend down in the end of the year and close 2011 at 6.1%.
- In 2012 inflation should continue trending down, but at a slow pace. We expect inflation to be around 5.0%y/y in the end of the year. The convergence to the 4.5%y/y target would, therefore, only occur in 2013.
- This scenario for inflation could, however, change significantly if current external turbulences refrain from easing. The deterioration of the situation in developed markets should have a deflationary effect on Brazil due to its impact on commodity prices and global demand.
- The materialization of this risk-scenario would create more room for the Central Bank to keep the SELIC rate unchanged at 12.50% in the end of August instead of adjusting it up by 25 bps as we currently expect. Markets will, therefore, stay very focused on the news coming from Europe and USA.
