Today eyes will be on Brazilian GDP, where some data such as the monthly activity indicator suggest that the economy could have entered into a technical recession with two consecutive declines in a row. However, discrepancies among monthly indexes and GDP lead us to believe that 4Q13 was slightly positive, but in line with a difficult beginning of year for the economy.

Brazil - Another 25bp adjustment of the Selic, could be the last one

As widely expected, the Monetary Policy Committee unanimously decided to hike the Selic by 25bp to 10.75, rather than by 50bp as in the last six months. This followed inflation's downward surprise in January, evidence that economic activity remains weak and that the economy could even have entered into recession at the end of 2013, the moderation of the exchange rate in the last few weeks, the recent announcement of a 1.9% of GDP fiscal target for 2014 (which should make the BCB continue to bet on a neutral fiscal policy this year), and previous official communication that highlighted the lagged impact of monetary policy. In the last few weeks all these facts have been making the consensus converge on the view that the Selic would be adjusted by 25bp yesterday. However, there is still significant uncertainty regarding the next monetary policy meeting in April. We expect the February adjustment to be the last one, but many analysts are expecting the adjustment to continue as today's accompanying statement maintains the expression "Continuing the adjustment process" and withdraws the expression "at this moment".

What to watch today

Brazil - GDP (4Q13, 07:00hrs NYT)

Recent indicators suggest that growth could have surprised to the downside, once again, in 4Q13. The IBC-Br, the BCB's economic activity index which works as a monthly proxy for GDP, declined 0.6% MoM and 1.4% MoM in November and December respectively, taking quarterly growth down to 0.2% QoQ. In 3Q13, the IBC-Br also declined 0.2% and GDP contracted 0.5% QoQ. Therefore, activity could have contracted for the second quarter in a row in 4Q13, implying that the economy could have entered a technical recession at the end of 2013. However, we stick to the view that 4Q13 was in positive territory, +0.4% QoQ more precisely. If our 4Q13 forecast is correct, GDP growth will have been around 2.2% in 2013. If 4Q growth surprises to the downside, however, not only would 2013 growth then be lower than expected but there will be an even clearer downward bias to our 2.5% growth forecast for 2014 (due to a smaller carry-over effect). Lower-than-expected growth would also support our view that yesterday's Selic adjustment was the last one.
